AutoCAD Engineering Solutions (AES) – AutoCAD C++ extensions (and related products), now owned by Autodesk, Inc., may be used to perform tasks in product design, analysis, and verification. For example, it is possible to use these extensions to import a STEP file into the drawing. Another function is to use the Visual LISP (VLS) or Visual Basic (VB) object-oriented language to automate some common engineering tasks. Although these extensions can be used to automate some tasks, their usage has limitations as they only work with certain file types. Programming of C++ extensions is available by writing programs in a Visual LISP dialect. Microsoft Visual LISP (VLS) is a proprietary C++ class library for AutoCAD, and is available in VBA or Visual Studio. Visual LISP was first available in AutoCAD version 2.0. Before the introduction of AutoLISP, programming AutoCAD was mostly done through VBA. VLS is proprietary, and a number of its features are not present in other AutoCAD languages. However, in January 2009, Autodesk announced a version of Visual LISP for AutoCAD that is available in both classic and 2010 AutoCAD. The original Visual LISP programming language was derived from C. AutoCAD's network protocol (AAX) allows remote access to AutoCAD by a network of computers. Remote users can interact with a drawing through a thin client, or they can directly access the drawing on the server. This can be useful when users are working on different areas of the drawing, or if a user has limited permissions to edit the drawing. "The whole thing is starting to become extremely disorganised, and the project is starting to become extremely neglected." There are still people from all over the world gathering up bits of wood, and there are many more people volunteering their time, but it has become much harder to get the materials together and connect people who want to get involved. "The amount of useful information about what people are doing and what's already been done has dropped significantly. 5b5f913d15
